Reflection

Throughout the research that I did for A Chorus Line I learned many things about myself. I discovered that I am very fond of colors and how it pertains to mood and conveying that through lights. One of my biggest fears is not being able to think creatively and form my own concepts in lighting. Finding my style and what I am drawn to was very helpful in the designs that I created. Much of the lights that I used correlated to the mood of the song, while also taking into account the melody and beat of the songs. One of the examples would be “The Music and the Mirror”, and how that song was upbeat, but was driven by ambition and longing. As I stuck to the Broadway like theme (conveying success), Cassie is under a saturated yellow light. The yellow light represents Broadway, success, and wealth and the saturation of the yellow represents the upbeat songs and her longing for wanting to be back in the spotlight. Seeing that I was able to merge those ideas from my own interpretation and lyrics helped me become confident in my own creative mind.

As I continued my designs and concepts, I also learned that oftentimes I was stubborn in making any changes to my designs, so I would end up altering it rather than scrapping my ideas fully. I was able to build off of my previous idea and add on to it to make it stand out. There were times in which I would look at previous concepts and felt that using the same concept would be fitting for the song. The song “The Music and the Mirror” is again an example as I used the same concept such as color in the song “One Reprise”. Another example is “Dance 10, Looks 3”, and the usage of marquee lights. There, I used it in the sign but in the song “One Reprise”, I used them as the background with no sign attached to it.

Throughout the process, I learned that creativity is built upon imagination and the continuous build of it. Learning to alter some ideas, and learning that I can use color, saturation, mood, and music to create art has allowed me to be more confident in my creative choices. I found myself to be more observant of lighting when I watch shows and movies, which is something I never thought of.
